literature of the nation. The story also deals some powerful blows against professional militarism, and comes near to leaving no standing ground whatever for war of any kind for any purpose. If Mr. Bridgman had followed out to their logical conclusions some of the premises laid down in his story, there would have been no more war for him.

AMERICAN DIPLOMACY IN THE ORIENT. By John W. Foster. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Octavo, cloth, 498 pages. Price, $3.00, net.

This work needs no commendation. Hon. John W. Foster, Ex-Secretary of State, is our foremost American diplomat, and has had a longer and more varied career in the service of his country in this capacity, if we remember rightly, than any other living American statesman. His work has also been of a singularly high moral order, entirely free from that narrow, chauvinistic, irritating, entangling spirit which has characterized so much of the diplomacy of the past.

His name, as author of the book, is therefore sufficient in itself to secure for it an immediate favorable reception, like that of his former work, "A Century of American Diplomacy," which has in less than three years passed through seven editions.

Mr. Foster's purpose in preparing this new work has been to gather together from a large amount of literature and present in consecutive order the chief features of our diplomatic relations with the Orient, so as to enable his countrymen to form a correct estimate of the policy which has controlled the American people in their contact with the countries in that quarter of the globe — a policy, the carrying out of which has, he believes, reflected great credit on the country.

He begins his narrative with a statement of the early relations of the European nations to the countries of Eastern Asia, — Portuguese, Dutch and British, — their exclusive commercial policy, the introduction of Christianity, the persecution and expulsion of foreigners, etc. Then America's first intercourse with those countries is taken up, — the difficulties encountered by American commerce, the character of our early trade, the first effort of the United States to establish diplomatic relations with the East, the first treaties, etc.

Then in successive chapters he discusses the history of our relations with Hawaii, the opening of Japan, the transformation of Japan, the opening of China and the policies of the powers toward her, Chinese immigration and exclusion, Korea and her neighbors, the political enfranchisement of Japan and her full admission into the family of nations, the annexation of Hawaii, the Samoan complications, and the Spanish war and its results.

Mr. Foster's treatment is primarily historical and only in a small degree philosophical and critical. It is a rich historical table which he spreads before his readers, and in the present condition of our national relations with the Orient and our growing intercourse therewith, all thoughtful and earnest citizens of the country ought, in order clearly to understand their duty, to acquaint themselves thoroughly with the events which he lays before us in this work.
